Acceptance of tamoxifen among pre- and postmenopausal women with breast cancer: an analysis using data from the Breast Cancer Detection and Demonstration Project. To compare the patterns of utilization of tamoxifen, tamoxifen use, and reasons for use, among pre- and postmenopausal women with breast cancer. Data from a cohort of women in the Breast Cancer Detection and Demonstration Project were analyzed for this study. These data contain information on 773,946 women treated between 1969 and 1981, including the age, race, treatment, and other clinical characteristics. The comparison group of women was similar to those in the study group in terms of age, race, stage of disease, and treatment. Univariate and multivariate analyses were used to describe the population and to determine whether differences in utilization were due to demographic and clinical characteristics or to drug therapy. The 5-year probability of receiving tamoxifen was lower among women who had not reached menopause at the time of diagnosis (38.1% vs. 49.5%). The proportion of premenopausal women who received tamoxifen declined in a linear fashion through time. Among premenopausal women who received tamoxifen, the use rate was lowest (12.9%) in the first year of the trial and highest (32.9%) in the last year of the trial. Menopausal status was a consistent and strong predictor of use for pre- and postmenopausal women. Among women who received tamoxifen, the proportions of users who cited either cancer risk reduction or symptom relief as reasons for use were remarkably similar 3e33713323
