ADVERTISEMENT Thanks for watching! Visit Website The human mind. Venture capital is flush with cash and sometimes its power brokers are even a little helpless. They're getting older and time is ticking on their long-term investments. And, they're worrying about what might happen to all their creations, including the ones that no one understands. "I think they're worried that the Internet might be frozen in its tracks," says venture capitalist Robert Balzer, who co-founded Atomico with Max Levchin, Google's co-founder and the head of its parent company, Alphabet. Balzer is a tech-savvy cancer survivor, but he is also concerned about the future of the venture capital industry itself. "Any threat to venture capital's business models can come from either the private or public sector," he says. "There are lots of ways you can be attacked from the public sector." The venture capital industry has been buffeted by AI, robotics, 5G, the Internet of Things and neuromorphic chips. Who knows what other threats might materialize?

"Then it became more sophisticated. Now we have the interesting thing going on with neuromorphic computing." Neuromorphic computing could be the biggest disruptive technology to come along since the Internet, Balzer says. "This is a technology that basically builds on biological computing," he says. "It might have the potential of revolutionizing everything that we do in the way that the Internet has done in the last 30 years." In the past, Balzer's career involved founding video game companies such as Electronic Arts, Sony and Sega, and his career's pivot from the public to the private sector began in 2014. The collective interest that robots and artificial intelligence have

Then he realized that I was having twins, so he just kind of laughed, smiled and said, "You have two?" and then asked where. I said, "Oh, I'm 33 weeks, here at a C-section." He looked at me, then looked at my husband and wife, and just started giggling. Of course they both understood immediately that they would be the ones to see the little babies when I came home. My husband is the person I'm happiest with most in the whole world, but my mother's being there for the births was by far the most important thing. She was right there holding my hand and staying with me through all of it. She would stay up til the wee hours of the
