Irritable bowel syndrome (IBS) is one of the most prevalent gastrointestinal disorders. The prevalence of diarrhea in IBS is well known to be higher than that of constipation, and IBS with diarrhea is one of the most common types. Xifaxan-neomycin (XN) is approved in the United States for the treatment of adults with IBS with diarrhea, but not in other countries including Japan, and its safety and effectiveness in Japanese patients remain to be confirmed. This is the first-ever, multicenter, randomized, double-blind, parallel-group, controlled, sham-controlled, and active-controlled study of XN in Japanese adults with IBS with diarrhea. The study is designed to evaluate the efficacy and safety of XN (2.4 g/day for 7 days) and its placebo in the treatment of patients with IBS with diarrhea. In total, 109 patients were enrolled from multiple centers. Patients were randomly assigned to one of the following four groups: the XN group (n = 35), the placebo group (n = 34), the sham group (n = 32), and the active control group (n = 28). The primary endpoint was the overall response rate at week 4. The secondary endpoints included the overall response rate at week 2, the number of defecations at week 4, change from baseline in Bristol Stool Form Scale score at week 4, and safety. There were no statistically significant differences in the overall response rate at week 4 among the four groups. The two-week response rate and the number of defecations were higher in the XN group than in the active control group. The Bristol Stool Form Scale score was also higher at week 4 in the XN group than in the active control group. Most adverse events were mild, and there were no serious adverse events. The double-blind, placebo-controlled study of XN in Japanese adults with IBS with diarrhea showed no significant difference
