once the attorneys representing siemens realize that they will be dealing with only a single individual (the roommate or suitemate), they are much more likely to settle. in my own case, this was the best way to handle the situation. my roommate was in a similar situation as i was, and we together e-mailed siemens on his behalf, explaining the situation and requesting a settlement. siemens took a while to respond, but ultimately, the company agreed to settle (for a fraction of the $150,000+ that the attorneys were initially seeking for me). before i provide you with the settlement agreement that the attorneys representing siemens plm (and of course, their attorneys) sent to my roommate, let me explain what i was doing when i received the notice from my isp. since i live in northern california, i use internet service from comcast. i have a comcast subscription, and a device called an instantaneous router or ir - which is essentially a wi-fi router (unless you have a non-wi-fi enabled router) that you plug into the modem. you plug in the ir into the modem, and you have internet access. i decided to use the ir instead of the modem, since i was concerned about the modem being located in the same room as my 3d printer (and i did not want to have to deal with the modem). the ir plugs into the modem, but it does not contain a cord; it plugs into the wall and has an ethernet port, which makes it ready for wired internet access. so if you wanted to plug the ir directly into the wall, you would not be able to plug in a router, since the ir has no ethernet port. this is why you cant plug in a wi-fi router into the ir. the ir also allows you to turn on your router, since it can be plugged into the ir.

engineers, after they learn they are not legally allowed to use their license, find it hard to pay the license and activation fees. this is of course illegal for them to do. some of them figure they can get away with the unlawful use, and they can work on the software without fear of being sued. these engineers have told me that, if caught, they would be terminated from their employment. many engineers in engineering related field, less than half of them have bought licenses. since the employees of the company are notoriously cheap and not at all easy to deal with, why do we hear so much about their poor service and web site design skills? it is a design flaw, that does not work for the company or its products, its a weakness with siemens' own product. this fight may go on for some time as we require that the defendant acknowledges receipt of the notice of intended litigation. we also require that he or she pay the agreed upon settlement within a specific timeframe or this acknowledgment of receipt becomes void and the defendant is required to respond to the complaint with a statement that he or she has denied all of the allegations of the complaint. the winner gets the domain name and the losers either have to give up the domain or to sell it back to the defendants. in addition, the defendant might have to pay the attorneys' fees and costs incurred by the defendant's attorney during the proceedings. the defendants' attorney's fees can be up to a significant amount of the settlement amount and can even exceed the settlement amount. so, there is no guarantee that the defendants will win and there is no guarantee that the defendant will receive any type of reimbursement for the costs incurred in the defense. in fact, if a defendant loses the litigation, he or she may owe the attorneys' fees and costs incurred by the defense. 5ec8ef588b
